Walter Colton : Ship and Shore, in Madeira, Lisbon, and the Mediterranean and Sea and Sailor (Classic Reprint) before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Ship and Shore, in Madeira, Lisbon, and the Mediterranean and Sea and Sailor (Classic Reprint):

Excerpt from Ship and Shore, in Madeira, Lisbon, and the Mediterranean and Sea and Sailor In defiance of a profound maxim of my distant relative - I say distant, because he was so far removed from me on the genealogical tree that even a Yankee peddler in the remote part of the South would not, upon the force of such a relationship, put up his horse and himself for more than six weeks, and that must place him on a very extreme twig, perhaps even its shadow. - By the way - it is a little singular that these fellows of the wooden nutmeg should always know where to find a market for their nuts and notions. But as I was saying - in defiance of a profound maxim of my distant relative - what a world of tender thoughts and emotions spring up in that one word relative - what beings step from the magic of its circle - uncles not a few, aunts without number, and cousins a whole ship-load - all taking a warm interest in you if rich, a pride in you if learned or politically great, and never deserting you unless you become poor blessings on their sweet hearts Without them what would a man - be, or rather, what would the world be to him - A garden without a flower, a grove without a bird, an evening sky without one lovely star. - His feelings.
