Not illustrated. 1918 Excerpt: ...could not always be readily effected, the special provision contained in clause 2 had lo be foreseen, and according to this special provision, in so far as concerns definite punishable acts of an especially grievous nature, war prisoners ma be held under arrest until the time of their release. It is self-evident that in the cases mentioned under Article 20 there is always the possibility that persons granted amnesty will be punished in their home State in so far as the lattcr's legislation permits. Those acts of amnesty granted to the national inhabitants and referred to in Article 21, §§ 1, 2, have their reason in the fact that this concerns contraventions which are committed within the sovereign jurisdiction of the opponent, and, hence, as a rule, more or less under the latter's-influence. In § 3, the provisions of Article 20 regarding the scope of impunity are declared applicable. Over and above this it has been agreed that legal prejudices may not be imposed upon the persons involved and upon their families. An adequate agreement could not be come to with regard to the cases of Article 20, because thereby the right, to deport aliens dangerous to the safety of the State, would have been considerably restricted. Furthermore, according to the general principles of international law, it would not be admissible to prejudice in their private property rights, and through administrative channels, those aliens granted amnesty in virtue of Article 20, for acts as are here referred to. The provision of Article 20, § 4, dealing with the temporary limitation of impunity is not 'applicable to the cases coming under Article 21, because this limitation in the cases coming under Article 21 is not due to the ratification of the Peace Treaty, but to th...
